Course Description: This course offers powerful new assessment and treatment tools; it is also a paradigm shift. The recipe was meant as a learning protocol to gain experience and confidence as a structural integrator and then after several years of practice let the series go and make it your own. This class and series will help you take your structural integration skills to the next quantum level. Imagine knowing when and how to work with tissues such as: organs, joints, bones, nerves, arteries, dural membranes, the spinal column and beyond. Balancing these tissues is a key to accomplishing the goals of structural integration. All the internal organs, joints (including those of the spinal column), bones, nerves, arteries and dural membranes are a central part of the connective tissue matrix and in most instances are more powerful entry points for influencing the alignment and mobility of the body than are the myofascia or superficial fascia. In this class you will learn multiple assessment techniques that allow to you quickly find where to work. (As we all know figuring out where to work and when to work an area can often be challenging, not anymore!) Once you know where to work you will learn how to apply several different gentle functional techniques allowing for a dramatic increase in ROM throughout the entire body and a dramatic increase towards the goals of SI. Learning these assessment methods is like adding MRI, CT scans and Ultrasound to the conventional X rays available in the first half of the 20th century. Decision making about what to do next in each structural integration session becomes quick and precise. This course sets the stage for the following four courses. In each course you will progressively deepen your assessment & treatment skills and dramatically increase your understanding of the anatomy of the human being. These courses are approved for IASI Type 1 continuing education credit, and for Rolf Institute continuing education credit.

Instructor Biography: Instructor Jeffrey Burch has been a Rolfer for 30 years. He is trained to the instructor level in Visceral Manipulation, and has in depth training in several directions of cranial manipulation. His teaching consistently gets rave reviews.
